Delivery Model

- Provides a software platform on which developers can build their own applications and host them
- Provides middleware-style services such as database and component services for use by applications
- Applications do not need to worry about the scalability of the underlying platform
- Fundamentally it acts as "Middleware" between IaaS and SaaS services

Examples

- Google AppEngine
- Amazon EC2 WaveMaker
- Database tools & software

Lincoln had to tell me about his house. He said that the walls were covered in vinyl (plywood, actually) and that he had to use a grinder to peel it off the walls to find the studs. He and his wife, Cass, are the original owners of the house, built in 1924, and they are restoring it as a guest house for the owners of the next house down the street, where the couple lives now. For most of the house's life, it has been abandoned and has fallen into some sad state of disrepair. Lincoln says that they are replacing nearly all of the electrical wiring in the house and removing the vinyl that is still on the walls. They will leave some of the original molding in place, but the repairs will be removed when they can't be taken off. I love this house and its history and look forward to spending some time there with the couple. I don't know how many other people have thought about the history of a house or neighborhood, especially one like this. They were looking for old records to play while restoring the house, so I pulled out a couple of 45s from the collection. One was the first single of Nat King Cole's legendary "It's Only Make Believe," which was not just his first major hit, but one of his most popular. Another 45 was a quickie by Four Seasons, a group from the New York City area that began with four ex-members of The Five Satins and have been together for over forty years. I was just listening to it when Lincoln came in, so I handed it to him. He made a face and said, "Do you think this is any good?" and handed it back. "Well, the drums were kind of groovy, and the bass was nice, but what was that guitar doing in the middle?" "They're playing in New Orleans," he said. "That's what they did." "Well, that's not the sound of a Four Seasons." We made a joke of it, but he was dead serious. Cass showed up with a camera to take some pictures of the house and as she was looking through the photographs she said, "My son is a 82157476af"
